The Hebridean Island of Lewis is the common theme uniting the three artists exhibiting in October. Responding to its remote, rugged open spaces and shoreline, they have created contrasting work which reflects their unique environment.

David Greenall's paintings and drawings are infused with a knowledge and understanding of light. Grinding his own colours from pigment, mixing tempera with wax, and charcoal with watercolour, supported by a keen draughtsman's eye, David presents work of fresh vigour.

Jane Harlington has a fascination with the shoreline and the liminal space between the permanent, solid assurance of land and the constantly changing tidal margin. Her medium of choice also has that quality of transience, using monoprint and collage elements to weave together the narrative of fleeting moments, seen and held in memory.

Gareth Watson works in watercolour with small brushes and a modest palette. His pictures are semi-abstract, firmly rooted in the romantic tradition, with open spaces and worn, weathered surfaces providing a poignant sense of the passage of time.
